FRANKS AND MEROVINGIANS

The Franks, like their southern neighbours west of the Rhine, the Alamanni, were a confederation of tribes (" Free men" and " All men") who had replaced in the course of the second and third centuries earlier Germanic groupings. Marcus Aurelius had fought hard and extensively against the Marcomanni, but every defeat of Germans seemed to encourage new growth aimed at the plundering of the Roman patrimony. Settled on imperial land as foederati, enlisted into the imperial army, Germans retained a divided loyalty, which, individuals apart, ensured a lasting distrust of them among the settled Romanised population of the west. In the reign of Gallienus, a small group of Frankish foederati from the north-west littoral seized ships and embarked on a pillage tour of the Mediterranean during which they caused havoc in the formerly safe, if decayed, heartland of the empire, almost taking Athens. In the next reign, c. 270, Franks burned their way through the cities of central Gaul. Suppressed by Aurelian and Probus and the First Tetrarchy, they were back over the Rhine to be repulsed by Constantine and Crispus in a long series of campaigns culminating in 320, whence celebratory gold solidi commemorating the defeat of "Francia". From about 290 comes the rise of Trier, Augusta Trevirorum, the great and heavily-fortified capital of pars occidentalis, the Rome of the west, but even she, when Franks and others crossed the frozen Rhine in Honorius' time (406) was to become vulnerable and was taken and captured back several times until final partial abandonment after the failed uprising of the usurper Constantine III, 411.

The Franks were now permanently in Gaul, but they had rivals among Goths and Germans, Burgundians, Visigoths and Alamanni. Nor had the Romans entirely given up the province; Aetius, ultimus Romanus, Valentinian III's energetic general, narrowly failed to drive the Franks from political power in northern Gaul, though he restricted the Burgundians to Aquitania in 436 and crushed the Huns at Chalons-sur-Marne in 451. Aetius' murder by his ungrateful master in 454 ensured that the control of Gaul would fall to the fittest of the barbarian federations.

Claiming descent from the sea, the Salian Franks, known as Merovingians, Merwingas, established their authority over most of Gaul during the reign of Clovis, seen as the founder of the French monarchy. Son of Childeric I, he became king of the Salian Franks in 481 and by force and cunning diplomacy increased his power, defeating King Chloderic of Cologne, Syagrius, the independent Roman governor at Soissons and succeeding in eliminating all other lesser Frankish kings of his line. In the course of the following twenty years he won decisive victories over the Alamanni and Visigoths, sufficiently established to have married into the imperial line in 414, gaining control of most of Gaul. In 508 the emperor Anastasius recognized him as consul and patrician. His power was greatly enhanced by his conversion to the Catholic faith in 496 at a time when most barbarian tribes embraced Arianism. In the Lex Salica, Clovis combined elements of Germanic and Roman legal traditions.

The succession of the Merovingian kingdom, where each son had to receive his own territory, would result in endemic internecine dynastic wars, with occasional periods when the kingdom was reunited. In the seventh century, and especially after the battle of Tertry in 687, true authority passed into the hands of the "mayors of the palace", ancestors of the Carolingians. The last of the rois fainéants was Childeric III, who in 751 was deposed and, in the Byzantine fashion, confined in a monastery.

The very fissiparous character of the the Merovingian rule is believed to have guaranteed its survival for over two centuries when other German regna fell, like Burgundians, Lombards or Visigoths, at, as it were, a push. Its internal tensions gave it an energy outlasting that of others, just as its devious and treacherous character, perfectly evidenced by Theodebert's betrayal of his Ostrogothic allies in 539, led to success in a failing world. The deadly throwing axe of the Frankish army, the francisca, or the scramasax, the long dagger to be used against personal enemies, could not however protect the Merovingians against the slow decline of the western imperium of semi-romanised Germanic regna. Populations were shrinking, particularly in the south, harried by recurrent plague. Trade was hampered by the loss of the infrastructure of Roman times, though for a century or so longer Marseille remained a port open for essentially luxury goods, for roads and seaways could not be protected in the absence of a standing army or fleet paid for by taxes raised from a quiescent peasantry. Gold supplies from successful wars dried up; the very warlike nature of the Franks deteriorated, as happened elsewhere to comparatively small barbarian populations absorbed by the inert mass of the existing population. Their armies for their interminable dynastic squabbles came to be led by the same Gallo-Roman nobles whose families furnished their bishops and courtiers. By the middle of the Carolingian period their language was a Celticised Latin dialect merely enriched by German loan-words. As to the coinage, although it ceased to honour the reigning emperor at Constantinople, independence was paid for by a forced decline from the solidus to the tremissis and from pure gold to electrum, a coinage struck at ad hoc mints following need rather than system. Only when the Carolingians under Pepin III turned to plentiful silver and set up their ports on the now relatively peaceful north-western littoral could that last attempt be made by Charlemagne to restore the empire in the west. It did not survive, but it did build a Franco-Roman bridge to a new feudal society whose roots were nourished in part by the tastes and ambitions of German war-bands who had seen splendour and wanted it for themselves.

Classification of the material follows the system established by Grierson in Medieval European Coinage I, Cambridge 1986:

I. Pseudo-imperial gold (nos. 1 - 4)

II. Quasi-imperial gold (nos. 5-7)

III. Royal gold (nos. 8-11)

IV. National gold and electrum (nos. 12-37 [Aquitania 12-20, Burgundia, 21-23, Neustria, 24-37])

V. Silver and copper issues (nos. 38-49 [Aquitania, 38; Burgundia 45-46; uncertain, 47; Carolingian, 48-49])

The period covered by this rare issue was one of internal strife but continued expansion of Merovingian hegemony by the successors of Clovis and Theuderic
The Ostrogoths in Italy modelled their gold coins on those of Byzantium. In March 519 the emperor Justin I (518-527) endeavoured to establish a reunion between the churches of Constantinople and Rome, striking a solidus with facing angel design, DOC 519. This change was ignored by the Arian Ostrogoths, who immobilized the earlier obverse and reverse designs, changing the obverse legend to conform with the name of the reigning emperor. The Merovingian, Visigothic and Burgundian mints each followed patterns created by the Ostrogoths, whom all the Germanic tribes viewed as the conqueror of imperial Rome and therefore their inspiration. This coin is readily identified on stylistic grounds as a Merovingian product, struck at an unidentified mint in Gaul.

In general, coinages struck in Romanised areas under Germanic control tend to have an imperial air, while those produced in lands never under Roman rule, north and east of the Rhine, are more barbaric and stylised in appearance.

With the decline of latinity, coin legends in the west became corrupted as in the east though markedly more so. This coin is therefore attributed to the period of Justin II (565-578) rather than that of Justin I (518-527). It is stylistically similar to a few coins that bear the signature of Lyon, and coins of this style have been found in that region of Burgundia. The bust shown to left is fairly unusual, though the type is relatively common.

Said to have been found in southern Russia (Armenia).
Minted at Marseille c. 585, by an uncertain, probably Jewish moneyer. Foreign trade in the early Merovingian period declined steadily with most of the residual activity taking place in Marseille and surrounding towns in Provence. This and the following two coins are examples of a most interesting quasi-imperial series in the names of Byzantine emperors from Tiberius Constantine (578-582) to Heraclius (610 until 612). The reverses of both solidi and tremisses of this series are modelled solely on the semissis of Tiberius Constantine. They were once thought to represent a return to imperial denominations in Provence, but this has been convincingly disproved by the work of Rigold and Grierson. It is now known that they were issued under Merovingian auspices but in the name of the Byzantine emperor because the Merovingian kingdom was divided among up to four kings, each of them utilising this path for all foreign trade from the regnum. Nearly a hundred of these coins are now known, the vast majority being tremisses. This solidus and the following tremissis are doubly interesting since they have marks at the end of the reverse legend that can only be determined as Jewish rather than Roman letters. A total of four coins are known with Hebrew letters, three being tremisses and this, unique, solidus. Each has what appears to be the letter ש "shin" at the end of the legend, three of these being on the reverse and on Rigold 18 and 19 after the obverse legend. In all probability, those represent the initials of a Jewish moneyer.

ROYAL ISSUES

Theuderic I, 511-534, in the name of Anastasius (491-518)

8 Solidus, Metz (?) c. 512-518, AV 4.43 g. CN ANLSTL-SIVS P P AVD Bust three-quarter r., wearing crested helmet with pearl diadem and cuirass, upon which T, and holding spear over r. shoulder and shield with horseman r. device on l. / VICTORI-AAVCCCA Victory stg. l. holding long voided cross; in exergue, COMOB, and, in field to r., seven-pointed star. This most important coin seems to be unpublished, cf., for type, Belfort 5159 and MEC 344. Extremely fine £8,000

Theuderic I, "king of Metz" was a son of Clovis (481-511) by a mistress. He nonetheless inherited an equal share of his famous father's kingdom with his three legitimate brothers, the region known as Austrasia, that is the lands around the Rhine, Moselle, and upper Meuse, with its capital at Metz, as well as the Massif Central.
The prototype is Ostrogothic, MEC 122, but the letter on the breast armour is clearly T . The practice of royal identification of barbarian coinage was apparently a Burgundian invention and Theuderic, having close relations with that people, was surely familiar with their coinage. His father married Chrodechildis, or Clotild in moder French, daughter of the Burgundian king Chilperic (561-584) and he himself married Suavegotha, daughter of the Burgundian king Sigismund (519-524). He served his father Clovis on embassies to several important Burgundian towns, including Rodez and Clermont-Ferrand.
Bronze coins with the monogram of Theuderic are well known, MEC 388, but until now it has not been recognised that he "signed" some of his gold coins in the rather dramatic fashion shown on this coin with a prominent T on the cuirass of the emperor. Although a number of Merovingian solidi with the name of Anastasius has variable and spurious letters in the obverse field, the placing of T on the breastplate can only refer to Theuderic. Contemporaries could however see this badge as, less vaingloriously, a Tau cross, analogous to the simple device on obverses of Arcadius' solidi at Thessalonica. For tremisses of Narbonne or Arles in the name of Anastasius and Justin I (518-527) with ·T· at the end of reverse or obverse legends, see MEC 187 and Tomasini, The barbaric tremissis in Spain and southern France, Anastasius to Leovigild, ANS NNM 152, 1964, groups A 3 and JI 2.

Theodebert, "King of Metz", 534-548

9 Tremissis, Austrasia c. 534-548, AV 1.42 g. DN THEODEOER TVSOd Diademed, draped and cuirassed bust r. / VICT[...]NI A-OC-C AN / CONOB Victory advancing r., holding wreath; in field to r., NF ligate over pellet. Belfort 5881. Lafaurie, RN 1983, pl. 21. Very rare. Very fine. £2,500

The coinage of Theodebert is among the most popular of the entire dark age period owing to the famous passage from Procopius, secretary of Belisarius, successful commander of Justinian's campaign to recover the western imperium.
Bell. Goth. III. 33. 5-6."...and also make a golden coin from the product of the mines in Gaul, not stamping the likeness of the Roman emperor on this stater, as is customary, but their own likenesses. And yet, while the Persian king is accustomed to make silver coinage as he likes, still it is not considered right either for him or for any other sovereign in the whole barbarian world to imprint his own likeness on a gold stater, and that, too, though he has gold in his own kingdom; for they are unable to tender such a coin to those with whom they transact business, even though the parties concerned in the transaction happen to be barbarians...". The last sentence is patently untrue, but Sasanid dinars were struck on the successive Roman weight standards. Some 35 solidi and 55 tremisses are known with the name of Theodebert, but because of their obvious historical interest, they are mostly in museums and rarely appear on the open market. Nearly all including this piece have monograms, typically on the reverse, which are widely thought to represent mint locations, though most are not readily identifiable. Procopius, following Roman ideas of maiestas, is insulted only by use of the barbarian king's name on the gold and not on lesser metals of silver or bronze. Procopius seemed also unaware that Theodebert was not the first to identify his gold coinage, the honour of which goes to the Burgundian king Gundobald (481-516) and his successors. They did this with reverse monograms, while retaining the imperial obverse legends.

10 Chlotar II, 612-629. Marseille, solidus of 20-siliquae, AV 3.71 g. CHLOTARIVS RE Diademed and draped bust r. / CHLOTARI VICTVRIA around pseudo-wreath enclosing cross potent between M - A over globe below between X - X. Cf. Belfort 2466-2467 and Prou 1380. A rare and important coin. Lightly struck with typical ill-formed obverse lettering. Die-break before face and a few minor obverse scratches, otherwise extremely fine. £3,500

Ex Vecchi sale 8, 1997, 391 and said to have been found in Tunisia.
In 613 Chlotar II became the sole legitimate male survivor of the line of Clovis and the entire Merovingian kingdom was united under him. This period and that of his son Dagobert I (629-639) represent the peak of Merovingian power. Not having to share influence in trade with his fellow sub-kings, his first economic move was to replace the emperor's image with his own on the commercial gold issues of Marseille from 613. He further lowered the weight from 21 to 20 siliquae as indicated on the reverse of this coin.

11 Childebert the Adopted, usurper in Austrasia, 656-662. Marseille, tremissis of 7-siliquae, pale AV 1.07 g. MASILI-A ∴ Diademed and draped bust right. / CH [IL]DEBERTVSRX around pseudo-wreath enclosing cross potent between M - L over globe between four pellets and two pellets. Belfort 2568 (Childebert III, this coin). Extremely rare and of considerable historic interest. Slightly chipped and cracked from 10 to 2 o'clock, otherwise very fine. £4,000

Ex Ponton d'Amécourt collection and Cabinet Numismatique Albuquerque mail bid sale 30, 1991, 84.
By the 650's the authority of the Merovingian kings was in a state of rapid decline with the power base rapidly shifting towards the 'mayors of the palace'. In addition there were significant aristocracy-occasioned squabbles between the two main kingdoms, Austrasia and Nuestria. When the elderly Sigisbert III (639-656) failed to produce male offspring, he adopted the eldest son of Grimoald, his mayor of the palace, and gave him the royal name of Childebert. Conflict then arose when Sigisbert had a natural heir, the future Dagobert II, late in his reign. When Sigisbert died in 656, Grimoald deposed the legitimate Dagobert in favour of his own son Childebert, often described as 'Childebertus adoptatus'. Despite the ensuing civil war Childebert is thought to have ruled for six years. He was eventually seized and murdered along with his father in c. 662, whereupon the legitimate Dagobert II was reinstalled as king of Austrasia.
In addition to the intrigues of power during the reign of Childebert, this coin is doubly interesting since it could be considered the earliest Carolingian coin. Childebert came from the same family as Pepin III, the first recognised Carolingian king. Pepin's great-great-grandfather Pepin I (d.640) was Grimoald's father.

Reverse crosses on a number of tremisses seem to be surmounted with an anchor. In reality this was intended to represent the Greek Chi-Rho mongram for Christ. For design symmetry the rho was often repeated retrograde on the other side of the chi, obscuring the original meaning. This variant was especially common in Neustria in the north but it does occur throughout the regnum. There are fewer mints in Aquitania than in other areas of the Merovingian kingdom. This highly romanised area of southwest France was typically under only the nominal political control of the various Merovingian kings and the coinage seems to be concentrated in several important mints rather than in a high number of tiny mints as in the north.

The prototype of this reverse is the Neronian Roma reverse issues of Lugdunum and Rome, struck to commemorate the reconstruction of Rome after the conflagration of 18th July 64. Design of most coins of the national gold period (580-670) consists of a draped bust right obverse and some form of reverse cross. The town name is typically on the obverse and the moneyer's name on the reverse, although this arrangement is sometime varied. Consistency was slow to develop and the first two decades of national gold witnessed considerable variation in design with a number of human figure and animal types and Roman models known. Most of these atypical types are scarce and desirable since they add some variety to this class.

Eligius, artisan, bishop and saint was a Gallo-Roman born in the city of Limoge c. 588, where he was apprenticed to the master of the mint, Abbo. In due course, his talent for engraving and smithing brought him to the attention of the court of Chlothar II by whom he was appointed to a similar post at Marseille; on Chlothar's death in 629, Dogobert I became his patron, and Eligius acquired considerable influence with the king. Numerous works of art, especially reliquaries, were attributed to his workmanship, such as the chalice of Chelles, destroyed in 1793, and the jewelled cross for the church of St. Denys, of which one small fragment survived the French Revolution. At Paris and other mints he produced coins for Chlothar II, Dagobert and Sigisbert III both with and without the name of the king, and probably only stopped working as a moneyer when appointed bishop in 641. He was the outstanding churchman of his day and his founding of religious houses, missionary work among the heathen Frisians and great generosity to the poor secured his canonisation. He became patron saint of smiths, farriers and of all kinds of metalworkers including moneyers, in whose guild chapels his image was often preserved; a fine example of this type of devotional art is the celebrated painting by Peter Christus, dated 1449, now at the Metropolitan Museum of Art (Lehman coll.), New York.

Merovingian copper coinage exists only in the municipal issues of Marseille and a few royal monogram pieces struck at uncertain locations. Its rarity is thought to reflect the meagre amount of local trade carried out by Gallic-Romans in the few generations following the loss of imperial power in southern France. Although modest in appearance, these municipal issues are historically significant and vastly scarcer than the gold tremisses.

Gaius, Institutiones, 1.122, informs us that ..."once they used only bronze coins, no gold or silver coin was in use, as we can understand of the Twelve Tables" which confirms Pliny, HN 33.13, that only bronze had a monetary function. This theory, however, is contradicted by Varro's (or of whoever the writer might be) that the name nummus also occurs for silver pieces attributed to Servius Tullius (traditionally 578-535 BC) and by the tradition preserved in Charisius, Ars grammatica, GLK, I, p. 105.5-7, ..."the silver coin is said to have been cast first by Servius Tullius". Nonnius, p. 520.17, also quates Varro, "Varro, De vita populi Romani, book 3: as silver and gold ingots were cast for the first time and stocked in the public treasury (aerarium)".

Bronze shells are sometimes found in hoards of aes rude and must have served as bronze bullion.

565 Aes signatum or bronze bar, Æ 1550 g. Large fragment of bar form. Cf. F. Panvini Rosati, Il ripostiglio di Castelfranco Emilia, nuovi elementi, Emilia Romana 6, 1970, fig 13. H. pl. 5, 1. TV p. 15. Very rare. Ferruginous copper, as cast. £500

The above uncoined copper ingot is associated with "ramo secco" bars which have been found mainly in Etruria, Umbria and Emilia and circulated as far as Sicily and Illyria. For find spots and comment, see M. Crawford, CMRR 3-6 and A. Burnett and P. Craddock,. "Italian currency bars", in Italian Iron Age Artifacts in the British Museum, 1984.

This rich selection of legionary recognition antoniniani provides information hitherto, it seems, unobserved: (a) the presence on well struck "draped" obverses of the class with reverses ending with VI P VI F of a trabea or lorica strap with the unmistakable consular insigne of a vine branch (wavy line with pellets), with its corresponding absence on those with the formula VII P VII F, apparently confirmed by pls. 15 and 16 of The Cunetio Treasure, strongly suggests (though further confirmation is needed) that the emperor's first coin-published legionary concessio or indulgentia, V P V F, belongs to 261 (for which also a consular adventus exists, Cun. 1504) and VII and VIII to 262, associated with gold multiples linked to both these years, Toynbee pl. 2, 1 and pl. 3, 11 and 12, and (b) the disappearance from small Milan issues of Valerian I late in the non-imperial consular year of 260, when his Persian disaster was reported. Further, though not always accurate, detailed of bust varieties can be found in Cunetio. The formulae V-VII P V-VII F are properly rendered, pace RIC V, 1, p. 34, as [number] fortiter et pie, Praetorian diploma (Vespasian, AD 76) in CIL XVI, p. 156, 21.

Alaric forced the Senate to proclaim Attalus emperor in late 409 and the above coin, not previously noted, imitates the contemporary Honorius VICTORIA AVGG issue RIC 1357 (see no. 1099 above), and has all the characteristics of a emergency coinage. On 23 August 410, after a long siege Rome fell to Alaric and his Visigothic horde, which proceeded to despoil, sack and burn for six days, sparing only the basilicas of St. Peter and St Paul. Relics of the event can still be seen to-day in the green stains which mark the floor of the Basilica Aemilia; the heat of the fire was so intense that the bronze coins dropped fused into the marble pavement.

É interessante notare come le leggende siano state cambiate e diventino al diritto MON NOV COM DECI rispetto all'originale MON NO LVCERNENSIS e al rovescio adirittura si sia cercata una stretta somiglianza con l'originale SANCT LEODIGARIVS trasformandola in SANCTVS LEONARDVS. Il disegno invece, fatta eccezione per la sostituzione dello stemma di Lucerna con quello dei Tizzone, è riprodotto fedelmente e ovviamente il titolo d'argento è molto più basso. É facile immaginare, in un' epoca in cui solo pochi sapevano leggere, come la moneta passasse in molte transazioni con lo stesso potere d'acquisto di quella buona.

COIN DIES

1758 Bohemia,Premsyl II 1253-1278. Iron die for Bracteates, 105 mm long, Ø 14mm at the face, the section above the face faceted square expanding to approximately Ø 25 mm. Crowned Bohemian lion rampant facing l., double tail entwined, within a thick, solid outer circle. The tops pread from hammering, surface blackened, design very fine and clear. £1,500

Bracteates of similar design attributed to the Bohemian king Premsyl II (1253-78) are well known (Cach 954); Donebauer 805). A note in the Donebauer catalogue says that many coins of the type were found in the Kyselowitz hoard.

1759 South Germany, 15th cent., perhaps Sigismund I, (King 1410-1433, Emperor 1433-1437), iron coin die, 116 mm long , 15 mm Ø at the face, the section above the face circular progressively expanding to 23 mm Ø. Crowned and draped bust facing r., S to l., gothic R to right; maker's mark (a cross-pommee) countermarked in shank. Top of die spread from hammering, surface corroded but design clear and generally fine. £700

The style is consistent with coins struck in Southern Germany in the 15th century. The portrait could represent Sigismund I; a number of new royal and imperial mints were established during the reign including one at Basel in 1429.

1760 Brandenburg, late 16th century (?). Iron die, 75 mm long, 14 mm Ø at the face, the section above the face faceted square expanding to approximately 24 mm Ø, with an orb with a large cross above ('reichsapfel'), surrounded by arabsques. Piece broken off at the top of the die, spread from hammering, surface blackened, the design very fine and clear.. £700

This typical of the reverse of a Brandenburg groschen of the 16th century, although the type is a common one that could have been used in other German states around the same date or even later. A very similar reverse, although with a date incorporated in the design, can be seen in Saurma-Jeltsch, ill. 2527.

1761 India, Mughal Empire, Shah Jehan 1628-1657. Bronze die for the reverse of a square-field Muhr or Rupee, the Shah Jehan legend quite clear in central square, the marginal legends including mint name less clear (cf. Hull p 607,2). Some stable corrosion damage at edges, about very fine, rare. £250

Perhaps a die for the regular coinage, this might also be a forger's.

SYLLOGE
NUMMORUM GRAECORUM
ISRAEL I
THE ARNOLD SPAER
COLLECTION OF SELEUCID COINS

The long-awaited publication of the Arnold Spaer collection of Seleucid coins has been prepared by Arthur Houghton and Arnold Spaer. It is part of the international series Sylloge Nummorum Graecorum. SNG Israel I presents all the 2920 Seleucid coins which have been acquired by Arnold Spaer since he started his collection in 1940. The coins range in date from the foundation of the Syrian kingdom by Seleucus I to the death of Antiochus XIII and the Roman annexation of the Kingdom.

The sylloge is more than a dry recitation of the Seleucid coins; it benefits from, extends and corrects research on Seleucid numismatics of the last half-century.

Case bound, 201 pages of text and 189 plates £75

The difference a good photograph can make

Quality photographs taken and processed the traditional way by a good professional numismatic photographer can make a great difference, not only to how the coins look, but to how well they sell. Here are just a few of the thousands of coins and medals I have photographed. I can photograph single pieces and whole collections for collectors, dealers, auctioneers and museums. Developing and printing the films myself guarantees high quality results.
